The Tale of Two Queens

Once, during a time of magick, there were two queens. There was Queen Eunomia, who ruled over the Northern kingdom, and Queen Cassandra, who ruled the Southern kingdom. Both queens practiced magick, but two very different types. Queen Eunomia practiced white magick, and focused her power on spreading prosperity through the kingdom and helping those in need. Queen Cassandra, however, practiced a dark magick, and even though she did occasionally use it to help her people, it was firstly used to benefit herself.

The Northern kingdom saw countless bounties and good fortune. Their harvest was plentiful, the sick were few and far between, and everybody had an air of happiness and content. The Southern kingdom did not see these riches and was filled with poor and destitute citizens whose days were dark and grim. When Queen Cassandra was confronted with how her people with living, she brushed it away and refused to acknowledge that anything was wrong. Years of using black magick had made her soul rot and either away.

Queen Eunomia was even asked by the citizens of the Southern kingdom to help them, and she agreed. The queen called upon other powerful white magick witches to reverse the spells that had been cast by Queen Cassandra. At the full moon, the witches met in the woods and cast their spell. As they did, the Southern queen fell to her knees and screamed in pain.

The only way to help the people of the Southern kingdom was to reverse the magic of their queen. All the energy that was used for Queen Cassandra's own benefit was reversed, all that the queen had consumed had turned to dust, and her body aged through decades in a mere minute.

MORAL: You reap what you sow

By E. Stillwell